

“A CO-OPERATIVE Association becomes a school in which employers are educated, and eventually, instead of one man in one hundred having the requisite capacity to direct the employment of others you have twenty-one, because the co-operative association has qualified twenty new men for the high and beneficial office of originating employments and directing successfully the productive energy of their fellow men.”

– Leland Stanford

“Co-operation of Labor,” New York Tribune, May 4, 1887